Anxiety: Psychiatry or Neurology?

Tuesday, May 25, 2010 - 14:10, Faculty room

The feeling of fear keeps us out of danger. Fear brings us closer to the psychologist or the psychiatrist – they are in charge of treating extreme forms of anxiety. Biological Psychiatry points to genetic, biochemical and anatomical brain abnormalities that can lead to anxiety. This view is not only limited to research. Modern psychology and biological psychiatry have led to an increase in behavioral treatment and to the increase of anti-anxiety medication. In light of these facts, one still asks 'how come so many people continue to suffer from anxiety?'. Should people suffering from anxiety try going to some other expert? Perhaps to a neurologist?
